The new software features new capabilities such as facial recognition and a real-time workspace, in which objects are tagged and then placed. ## Adjusting Lighting in Photoshop Lighting is a critical issue when dealing with images, as it affects the mood and moods of the scenes depicted in the photographs. You can adjust the quality of light on a photograph by adjusting exposure, tinting, color, and color temperature. The main issue to consider when adjusting the lighting is how well the image matches the mood you want. If you want a photograph to portray a sultry female, for example, then a yellowish-orange light (corresponding to warm colors) will best achieve that mood, and your choices will be limited to those with that color temperature. Exposure refers to how much light the exposure sensor (or film) receives, and it is controlled by a shutter speed in conjunction with an aperture setting. The shutter speed controls how long the shutter stays open to allow light to hit the sensor, while the aperture setting affects how much light is allowed to pass through the lens. Aperture sizes typically start with a f-stop number and then are followed by an f-number. You want to open the aperture setting (which becomes a smaller number, like 1/2-stop) as far as possible without allowing too much light in. When the aperture number reaches a 1, the lens is fully open. Figure 9-2 shows the effects of a 1/2-stop aperture and a 1-stop aperture. As the aperture is made smaller, the number of rays of light that are allowed in is decreased. The small hole at the center of the image (called a _circular exposure area_) is a prime example of why it's important to stay just above that number. As you make the aperture smaller, the area at the center of the image becomes smaller, so your ability to control depth of field is reduced. **Figure 9-2:** The larger the aperture, the more light passes through the lens
